Bonn To Continue To Prosecute Nazi War Criminals Despite Statute, Says Bundestag Member In U. S. Capitol

A twenty-year statute of limitation that runs out next May 8 will not be allowed to prevent future prosecutions of Nazi war criminals in West German courts, a member of the German Parliament said in Washington, reports Laurence Barrett, of the New York Herald Tribune. Erik Blumenfeld, a member of the Bundestag (lower house) Foreign Affairs Committee who is closely identified with the Erhard wing of the ruling Christian Democratic party, said news reports from Bonn in November were wrong in stating that the German government would allow May 8 to come and go without taking any action.

"We are fully aware of the problem," Mr. Blumenfeld said. "We will see to it, one way or another, that this will be taken up and voted upon. I have no doubt of the outcome."

Mr. Blumenfeld spoke to reporters at a luncheon arranged by the West German Embassy in Washington. This quasi-official setting, the fact that Mr. Blumenfeld allowed himself to be quoted, and the stress laid by Embassy spokesman on his closeness to Chancellor Erhard's Cabinet indicated that Mr. Blumenfeld was speaking with far more authority than is usual for a member of a foreign Parliament on a rather informal visit to Washington.

On November 11 an official government announcement in Bonn gave rise to the first news stories [illegible] were incorrect. The actual government decision, he said, was simply against enactment of a special law that would apply only to Nazi war criminals. He said such a measure could be viewed as resembling Nazi tampering with the German judicial system.

There was adverse reaction to that story, especially from Jewish organizations. Bonn has been sensitive to the criticism, made by some authors and journalists, says the New York Herald Tribune, that the postwar leaders of West Germany have not been as diligent as they might have been in rooting out Nazi influences and prosecuting those responsible for atrocities during the Hitler regime.

Nevertheless, a second statement in Bonn on November 20 still left the impression that the twenty-year statute of limitations would apply to war crimes.

As it is generally understood, a statute of limitation on criminal offenses prescribes a maximum time period from the date of the crime in which prosecution can be brought. May 8, 1945, — the date of the collapse of the Third Reich — was chosen as the starting date of the period in which war criminals could be brought to justice.

Mr. Blumenfeld said there were "thousands" of cases under investigation which have not yet reached the stage of court action. These, he said, would be unaffected by the running out of the statute of limitation in any event.

On the possibility that other suspects might be unearthed after May 8, two bills are under consideration in the German Parliament for action before May 8.

One would extend the statute of limitation on all capital crimes — those carrying maximum prison terms — to thirty years. This would allow another ten years for new investigations without singling out war crimes cases for special attention.

An alternative measure would change the starting date of the statute from May 8, 1945, to either September, 1949 (the birth of the Federal Republic of West Germany) or May, 1955 (when the government assumed full powers, including the responsibility of prosecuting war criminals).

Up to 1955, Allied courts sentenced more than 5,000 Germans as war criminals. Another 5,445 have been convicted and sentenced by West German courts since then, says the New York Herald Tribune. Thousands of others have been tried and acquitted.

The Federal Government is now emphasizing that it is up to gov-

U.S. Scolds Syria And Israel For Resort To Arms At Border

The United States said at United Nations that both Syria and Israel were to blame for the recent border clash. It called on both to cease provocations that could endanger the sixteen-year-old Palestine armistice.

But the Soviet Union, directing a sharp attack on Israel, said the Security Council should condemn her for "aggressive acts." The Council ended its third debate on the latest Syrian-Israeli incident without a resolution and only a decision to meet again soon.

Brazil and the Ivory Coast took the position of most members that there should be practical measures to prevent a recurrence of the fighting, says the New York Times. They especially urged a survey and demarcation of the border north of the Sea of Galilee.

Four Israelis and seven Syrians died on November 13 as a result of a two-hour fight, which began when an Israeli patrol vehicle approached the ill-marked border.

A brief but angry exchange was touched off when Rafik Asha, of Syria, attacked a speech by Britain's Lord Caradon as having been overly friendly instead of critical of Israel.

"If the representative of the United Kingdom did not have instructions to blame Israel publicly" Mr. Asha protested, "he should have, at least, refrained from speaking in a manner detrimental to the Syrian and Arab interests, the more so when the Government he represented professed the desire to improve its relations with the Arab world."

Lord Caradon, the former Sir Hugh Foot, has spoken of his own service as a youthful British administrator in Palestine when it was a mandated territory. These recollections prompted the Syrian to complain that the Briton had been carried away by his high ideals of the brotherhood of man and Christian charity, and by his nostalgic reminiscences."

In the absence of Lord Caradon, Roger W. Jackling, of Britain, replied that his country's position was that conciliation rather than condemnation was advisable, espe-

LORD MARKS, HUMANITARIAN, HEAD OF A $400 MILLION STORE BUSINESS, WAS RETAILER WHO REVOLUTIONIZED BRITISH MERCHANDISING BY LESSONS LEARNED IN UNITED STATES

Lord Marks of Broughton, chairman of the $400 million Marks & Spencer stores organization, died at his office in London. He was seventy-six years old.

The British retailer, who revolutionized the nation's merchandising techniques, had suffered from heart trouble in recent years. He was hospitalized last year and again a few months ago, says the New York Times. The shares of Marks & Spencer, Ltd., fell sixpence (seven cents) after news of Lord Mark's death. The fall cut more than £5 million ($16 million) off its market valuation.

Lord Marks, who was Sir Simon Marks before his election to the peerage in 1961, headed a thriving, family-controlled business with two hundred and thirty-seven branches throughout Britain. Eight of the ten members of the Marks & Spencer board are family members.

Lord Marks leaves his wife, Miriam; a son, Michael, who is not in the business; a daughter, Hannah; and four sisters.

He and his family have been noted benefactors of Israel, and the Israeli Embassy said in tribute:

"To Israel and to the Jewish people as a whole his loss is irreparable. A beloved and key figure for nearly two generations, he was a builder of Zion whose name will rank high in the pantheon of Jewish history."

A left-wing politician in Britain, praising the welfare services of Marks & Spencer for its employees, once declared that the program had put socialism into practice.

Lord Marks answered the politician by saying that he had learned a decent code of conduct toward his fellow man not from Karl Marx but from Michael Marks, his father.

This tribute was typical of Lord Marks, who frequently credited his father as his inspiration and the source of many of his ideas, says the New York Times. By the same token, the institution of the welfare services also was typical of the multimillionaire businessman, who was one of the six richest men in the world.

His whole philosophy in business revolved around his stated goal of selling articles of the highest quality at prices within reach of every family. As a result, his customers included persons of every class and income.

It had often been said of Lord Marks that profit and money-making were more a by-product of his activities than the principal objectives.

"One can become rich in all kinds of ways," he once said. "You can own an oil well, and if you like you can sit and watch it making you richer every day. But what's the point of it unless you do something with your money?"

"Rich men must learn to give," he added. "For some it is the hardest lesson of all and some of them never learn it."

As he said himself, Lord Marks learned it from his father. What he learned produced a social revolution of sorts in British merchandising and made Marks & Spencer as much an educational institution as a commercial enterprise.

Michael Marks emigrated from Poland to Leeds in the industrial midlands in 1884. There he began the business that today sprawls all over Britain. Mr. Marks was not an educated man, but very clever and able, and he had the kind of respect for education that sometimes means more than education itself, says the New York Times. Michael Marks gave his son, Simon, an excellent education.

The father set up a stall in the weekly Leeds market. He sold haberdashery, pins, needles, buttons, laces, thread, and other inexpensive articles. His slogan for selling the goods:

"Don't ask the price; it's a penny."

Michael Marks made the prices uniform so that he would not have to bother with complicated bookkeeping and so that he could figure the prices in his head. His son, too, had no tolerance for complicated and inefficient bookkeeping.

His constant search for more efficiency and economy in operation, for instance, led to a drive some years ago to eliminate needless paper work throughout the chain. This was touched off when he found some of the salesgirls in a branch working overtime one Saturday filling in record cards. Neither he nor they could explain why the cards were necessary.

The reforms he instituted resulted in the elimination of twenty-two million pieces of paper weighing about one hundred and five tons that the company had used each year. Time clocks and a million time cards also were eliminated when it was found that supervisors were better checks on lateness.

But while he had a sharp eye for efficiency, he also had a certain ruthlessness in judging others who had not met his own high standards. He had a quotation on his desk that read:

"The day is short and the work is great and the labourers are sluggish and the reward is much and the master of the house is urgent," says the New York Times. For all of his friendliness and humanity, there was no doubt about who was the master — and an urgent one at times.

Five years ago, at the age of seventy-one years, when the small Lord Marks was still jaunty and extraordinarily youthful looking, a colleague said of him: "If he thinks that something is wrong, he will take weeks and months to find out what it is and to make his mind up what to do about it. But when he has made his mind, something has to be done quickly, or there will be trouble."

Money was said to be the least interesting thing about this great money maker. But his occasional disregard for it was one of the most interesting.

Marks & Spencer once did a very profitable business selling ice cream. It amounted to nearly $2 million a year. But Lord Marks dropped the item from the sales list because he found that the customers dropped the wrappings on the floor.

Lord Marks had an almost fanatical interest in hygiene and cleanliness, and he also kept a close watch on the standards of the products he sold. The chain arranged with manufacturers to follow exact specifications for the goods they sold.

At its impressive Baker Street headquarters, Marks & Spencer has modern laboratories, testing kitchens, and designing rooms where specifications on such items as clothing, shoes, and food are made and tested.

Simon Marks was born in Leeds on July 9, 1888, four years after his parents had emigrated from Poland. The business was started the year before. As the business prospered, the father took in a partner, Thomas Spencer, a Yorkshireman who invested $1,209 in the company.

Mr. Spencer, who had been a textile company sales manager, died in 1905, two years before his partner. The company then owned seventy Penny Bazaars, says the New York Times. At his father's death, Simon, not yet twenty years old, joined the business.

He became a director in 1911 and chairman of the company five years later. He also served as joint managing director with his wife's brother, Israel M. Sieff, who had been a schoolmate of his. Their policy was to plow much of the profits back into the business.

This attractive harbour is part of the friendly city of Belleville, Ontario, lying midway between Toronto and Montreal on the beautiful Bay of Quinte.

You don't have to be a yachtsman to find this picture of interest — this is the water entrance to one of the best industrial locations in Ontario!

Belleville is looking for industrial settlers. The city fathers have incorporated an industrial commission to let the world know it is in the market for new businesses.

If you are thinking of expansion or re-location, you can't afford to ignore Belleville. Its geographic, economic, fiscal, social and recreational advantages are substantial and real. The exact differentials in Belleville's favour will, of course, vary with the kind of product you manufacture, the kind of labour you hire, the carrier you ship by, your building and land needs and your service requirements. Give us some idea of the conditions under which you ideally operate and the markets you serve and let us prove that Belleville should logically be the home port for your new plant.

LORD MARKS, HUMANITARIAN, HEAD OF A $400 MILLION STORE BUSINESS

That policy, to some extent, has continued. The chain has concentrated on rebuilding, improving, and modernizing the 237 stores — the number it had before World War II — in order to bring every store up to the standard of the latest and most modern. For this purpose, the chain was spending about $11 million a year.

Lord Marks was graduated from Manchester Grammar School, and later spent two years abroad learning French and German. He never attended college, but was awarded an honorary Doctorate of Science by the London School of Economics in 1939. He was knighted in 1944 for his public services.

Lord Marks had a great interest in Zionism, of which he was a staunch adherent since 1918, when he met Dr. Chaim Weizmann in Manchester, says the New York Times. Dr. Weizmann, the first president of Israel, was then a lecturer in biochemistry.

Lord Marks was among the first to give financial support to the idea of founding a national home of the Jews in Palestine. While serving as a signaler in the Royal Artillery during World War I, he was detached to assist Dr. Weizmann in his task of making the Jewish national state a reality.

He saw no conflict between his Jewish and British allegiances. Before World War II, he helped to organize the British Air Cadet Corps, and during the war he served as honorary adviser to the Ministry of Petroleum Warfare. He was an early board member of the British Overseas Airways Corporation.

Lord Marks liked the theater, music, and impressionist paintings. He was greatly influenced by the writings of Dickens, especially his description of fear and poverty during the Industrial Revolution.

And he was impressed after having seen Tennessee William's "The Glass Menagerie" on a visit to New York. He saw in the play the terrible effects of loneliness, and through his company sought to bring happiness into people's lives, says the New York Times, by instilling in them a sense of confidence and security.

Lord Marks, of Broughton, who died in London at the age of seventy-six years, was one of the great formative influences in the social and economic life of England during the past generation.

His dynamic and imaginative reform of the retail trade reached its climax coincidentally with the arrival of the welfare state and the affluent society, says the London Times. It was through the firm of which he was the head that the new classes, brought into being by this social revolution, were able to meet many of their needs, particularly in smart and tasteful dress at prices that they could afford.

A man of wide and liberal interests, he was modest in manner, a good talker, and companion. To the man in the street he will be remembered as the real initiator of high quality, low cost clothes and, at a later stage, even food.

The secret of this retail revolution, hammered out by Marks & Spencer over several years, was not so widely apparent. It was based on a simple principle: that the main function of the retailer was to tell the manufacturer what the public needed.

Both he and Israel Sieff, who married each other's sisters and became life partners in business, learnt the lesson in the United States and persistently bullied, cajoled, and persuaded manufacturers to make what they knew they could sell.

Lord Marks of Broughton was born on July 9, 1888, son of Michael and Hannah Marks. He was educated at Manchester Grammar School. On the unexpected and early death of his father in 1906 he went into the family business, Marks and Spencer Ltd., and for the rest of his life a major interest was the direction and development of the firm.

Marks and Spencer Ltd. had been founded by Michael Marks in Leeds market in 1884. By the time that the young Simon Marks took over, it was already a thriving chain of bazaar stores based on the principle of a fixed price. "Don't ask the price, it's a penny" was the firm's slogan.

The firm continued to prosper under its new management, but the first World War inevitably changed the whole approach to trading of this type. Simon Marks was called into the forces but was released to work with Chaim Weizmann on various Government projects. This association served to strengthen his already great interest in the cause of Zionism.

With the peace the firm again became his major interest. The fixed price principle had had to be abandoned and major changes in the philosophy of the business had to be devised, says the London Times. Following several visits to the United States to study merchandising methods there, in the late twenties Simon Marks began the main work of the development of a type of store new to Britain and probably unique in the world.

His approach was firmly based on certain principles. They were that there should be a ceiling to prices — in this case 5s. — and that it was a main function of the retailer to tell the manufacturer what was needed in the way of design and quality. This latter approach was the most fundamental change and it took many years, often in the face of opposition, to educate suppliers to accept this.

By the outbreak of the Second World War the principles of specification buying were well established. Indeed, such was the value of these that some of them were adopted by the Cloth Control as specifications for the standard cloths which were introduced. In particular this was the case with certain types of rayon cloth.

Again war caused fundamental changes. The prime limit principle had to be abandoned once more, and has not since returned. Since 1945 the growth of the company has been based very firmly on the principle of giving maximum value for money.

These values were obtained by setting high and rigid standards of manufacture for suppliers. These standards were based on much research and testing of new products and new production methods. This applied particularly in the field of synthetic fibres and, more recently, in food manufacture.

It was always Simon Mark's policy that the firm should have its own extensive research and testing facilities. Through these, new developments in materials and production techniques could be translated into saleable merchandise as soon as possible.

In recent years, under his inspiration, big advances have been made in the food fields where the basic principles of hygiene and quality control of materials led to the development of a range of products which have become very popular with the shopping public, says the London Times. The standard of shopping facilities offered to the public were always foremost in his mind, and the results are shown in the present standards of Marks and Spencer stores.

Simon Marks was an inspiring leader, although he could at times be exacting. He had a genius for merchandise selection and for merchandising. He had the ability to select executives of the right calibre to carry out his ideas.

He was attentive to detail and was daily to be seen in one or other of the stores, discussing with the sales girls in particular the needs of the public and their reaction to the merchandise. He was the most human of employers and the welfare and other arrangements for his employees were outstanding.

A man of great humility, he was very proud indeed when he was given the Tobe award in 1962 for distinguished contributions to retailing, especially as this was the first time that this award had been given to a retailer operating outside the United States.

Apart from business Simon Mark's range of interests was wide. These included in particular Zionism, and the State of Israel. His early association with Weizmann lasted until the latter's death. He took a most active part in all the problems involved with the new state of Israel and his contribution to industrial, commercial, and scientific developments there was crucial, says the London Times. Since the formation of the new State he made many visits there and his advice was always available and much sought.

His interest always included science and the application of scientific developments to practical purposes. During the Second World War he gave valuable service to the Scientific Co-ordination Committee. He was knighted in 1944 and created a Baron in 1961, assuming the title of Baron Marks of Broughton of Sunningdale. He was an honorary Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons and of the Weizmann Rehovoth Institute of Israel. London University granted him an honorary D.Sc. (Economics) in 1939 and Manchester made him an honorary LL.D. in 1962.

In private life he was a family man and ideal host, with an exceptional range of friends; he was particularly fond of the young; and in his later days was happiest when surrounded by his grandchildren.

Marks was a generous and discriminating philanthropist. In 1956 he gave £52,500, spread over seven years, to the Royal College of Surgeons. A little over a year later he gave £100,000 to the College. Other gifts included £7,000 to the R.A.F. Benevolent Fund and £60,000 to Manchester Grammar School—his old school—for new science laboratories.

He gave £60,000 towards the refectory at University College, London, and later in 1962 £100,000 to University College, says the London Times. The following year he arranged for the British Heart Foundation to receive gifts totalling £200,000.

The Hon. David Montagu writes in the same newspaper: What kind of a man was Simon Marks? To those of us who were privileged to know him well, the tributes to his genius tell only part of the story, for it was for his great humanity that many of us will always remember him.

He had unique gifts and depths of understanding which few men have enjoyed. The ability to talk to people of all ages at all intellectual levels without appearing bored and adapting himself immediately to the wavelength of the company he was keeping was perhaps the most striking of these gifts.

No child, no young man or woman could talk to Simon Marks without feeling that he was intensely interested in what they had to say. For him there were no barriers, no prejudices.

For him life was a challenge and had to be lived to the full. His contribution was not just in the field of business but to the greater understanding between his fellow men. It was indeed an honour to have known Simon Marks.

THE BLINDNESS OF HATRED

The London Times says:

The reaction in some Arab quarters to the Vatican Council's debate on the Jews was predictable but none the less distressing. It has now been taken a stage farther in the Jordan Parliament, where the Prime Minister announced a "blacklist" of the fathers who had a share in absolving the Jews from guilt of Christ's crucifixion.

The argument presumably is that, in view of the persisting tension between Israel and the Arab world, this is no time for anyone anywhere to absolve the Jews collectively from anything. It is, in fact, more an emotional reaction than an argument.

Being emotional, it contradicts the distinction which Arab spokesmen have usually taken care to draw between Zionism as a political movement and the Jews as a people, pointing out with justification that Jews living in Arab lands were generally better treated than those in Europe.

That is something to boast of. There can be no boast in saying that the creation of Israel in 1948 is evidence that the Jews remain guilty of deicide.

Had the condemnation of "any theory or practice which leads to discrimination between man and man or between nation and nation" been advanced at a non-aligned conference or the United Nations it would have received universal acclaim. It does not lose its validity because it appears in a declaration of the Church — a declaration which, in the opinion of some, has already been watered down to meet Arab objections.

And how many Arabs, it may be wondered, realize that the same "love for our brethren" led the fathers, in another part of the appendix on Jews and non-Christians, to single out "first of all the Muslims . . . who, in religious feeling as well as through many channels of human culture, came closer to us"?

Christians are in a minority in almost every Arab country. They are naturally anxious to dissociate themselves from any outside act which can be twisted to impugn their patriotism. In some quarters their reaction has already led to a demand that the Churches in Arab lands should somehow mark their distinction — or even cut themselves off — from the parent Churches in the west. It would be hard to imagine a sadder consequence of the Vatican's efforts to grapple with ecumenism than this misreading of the documents.

SEVENTH-GENERATION ISRAELI WAS WIFE OF YESHIVA U. PROFESSOR

Mrs. Shulamith Mirsky, aged sixty-five years, wife of Rabbi Dr. Samuel Mirsky, Professor of Rabbinics at Yeshiva University's Bernard Revel graduate school, died at Brookdale Medical Center, Brooklyn, N. Y., after a long illness.

Mrs. Mirsky, the former Miss Shulamith Solomon, was a seventh-generation Israelite from a family whose business, the Solomon Press, introduced the first printing press into Israel. The firm recently marked its 100th anniversary.

She lived at 1415 48th Street, Brooklyn. Also surviving are a son, David, Dean of Admissions and Associate English Professor at Yeshiva; and a daughter, Sarah, whose husband, Dr. Meir Havazelet, is assistant professor of Hebrew at Yeshiva's Stern College for Women.

cially when the United Nations' own investigations had shown the difficulty in assessing guilt for the border violation.

Adlai E. Stevenson, the United States delegate, said it was disappointing that both Syria and Israel had resorted to arms, which, he added, had no place in the border area. He said it was clear that, instead of turning to the United Nations machinery, "each side struck immediately at the other."

Mr. Stevenson noted that the Council could not dictate to the Governments of Syria and Israel that they must live at peace with each other, says the New York Times. "We can only recommend, urge, plead with all our energy that the mechanisms for peaceful settlement, and not guns be used," he declared.

Nikolai T. Fedorenko, the Soviet representative, called Israel the direct source of tension in the area. He blamed Israel for using bulldozers that, he alleged, had encroached on Syrian territory. He charged that the border incident had been contrived by Israel to serve as an excuse to carry out a deliberately planned aggression.

BONN TO CONTINUE TO PROSECUTE NAZI WAR CRIMINALS

ernments and organizations abroad to hand over documents in their possession, says the London Times. It suspects that the Communist countries of Eastern Europe will not comply with Bonn's request for political reasons, and it seems prepared to write off the East German regime.

It is not accepted international practice for governments to send documents from state archives abroad — and Jewish or East European organizations may have particular reservations about dispatching such material to Germany. Yet the Bonn appeal did not say that the Federal Government was prepared to send lawyers to other countries to inspect documents or to finance the preparation of copies.

Everything now depends on the response from outside Germany. According to Dr. Nahum Goldmann, president of the World Jewish Congress, speaking at Bonn, there are masses of unworked documents in Eastern Europe and in the United States.

Although substantial efforts have been made by the West German authorities through the Ludwigsburg centre for the investigation of Nazi crimes, no one can even estimate how many Nazi criminals have managed to escape justice. The best guesses range from several thousands to hundreds.

Official suggestions that the number can only be small are not shared by lawyers who have specialized in such work. The Ludwigsburg centre, it is pointed out, has worked through only parts of the Nazi bureaucracy. The S.S. administrative and economic offices, the Führer's Chancery, and the Ministries of the Interior, Justice, Eastern Affairs, and Transport, says the London Times, during the Third Reich have still not been investigated in detail.

Rejoicing On Churchill's Birthday

The London Times says:

Today is not an occasion for panegyric, but for thanksgiving. It calls for simple words, such as come from the heart. The greatest of living Englishmen is ninety. Warm as other nations' rejoicings are, they come second to Britain's. For Sir Winston Churchill is ours. He belongs to the world. He belongs to history. He belongs to the ages. He belongs to us first of all. For those of middle age and beyond, there is the wonder of his career and the inspiration of having been led by him through the war. For the young there will be, in years to come, the pride of having been born in his time. Great men there will assuredly be again. The names, past or future, that will be put alongside his will be few. Though the British Commonwealth last a thousand years, he will always be of its finest flower. To Sir Winston and Lady Churchill the nation on this day sends renewed affection and gratitude.

New Hampshire Condemns Anti-Semitism In Soviet

The 50,000 member New Hampshire AFL-CIO spoke out forcefully in condemnation of anti-Semitism in Soviet Russia at their recent annual convention, reports the Jewish Labor Committee. The New England body charged, in a resolution that was adopted unanimously at its meeting in Manchester, that the Soviet government has engaged in "suppressing Jewish culture and cultural institutions, singling out Jews as scapegoats for the failure of the Soviet economy, and in fostering anti-Semitic sentiment."

The labor body called for protest actions by the U.S. government and the United Nations. It also stated, "We call for official Congressional expression against Soviet anti-Semitism, and toward that end instruct the Secretary-Treasurer of the New Hampshire AFL-CIO to forward copies of this resolution to the Senators and Congressmen from the State of New Hampshire."

In another resolution dealing with the Human Rights treaties of the UN, including the treaty against Genocide, the labor convention called for their prompt ratification by the U.S. Senate, resolving to "endorse the labor drive in behalf of the Genocide Convention that is being sponsored by the Jewish Labor Committee" and called upon "Senators from this state to lend their fullest aid to efforts to bring this treaty to the floor of the Senate and win ratification."
